Whether or not the United States will build more mortars of the type now installed at Battery Harlow, Fort Ruger, will depend upon the results of a firing test that began this morning under the critical scrutiny of several of the "higher-ups" in division military affairs.

This became known today when the tests began. The guns are being tried out to see if they will stand a high powder charge and give results under it, if not, the type used at Harlow will be modified in future construction, say the officers. Of this type but four have been made, and all are at the Harlow pits, so the eyes of not only the Western Division but of the entire Ordnance Department are upon these tests.

Two shots were fired this morning with a normal powder charge, from sixty-five to seventy-five pounds. The results were carefully noted. Tomorrow six more shots will be fired with a much higher charge, and it will be seen if the range is increased from 12,400 yards to more than 13,000. A longer range is the goal that the tests are directed towards.

At the tests this morning there were Gen. Macomb, commanding the Department of Hawaii; Lieut. Col. Reese, chief engineer officer of the Western Division; Capt. Waller of the Ordnance Department, who came here from division headquarters in San Francisco to witness the tests; Capt. Carter, Maj. Wooten, Corps of Engineers; and others. The projectiles used this morning weighed 824 pounds.

The Taft League is going along smoothly in its plans for the Territorial convention. It is sticking to its two announced objects of getting a
